Flemmings, Ramsceair Jacques, "The Bench"

Endless loneliness has caused me to take a seat all alone.
Not one soul desires to come near, for they feel my inner groans.
High above the realm of reality, I sit and rest.
Below I still bear witness to all of the mirth I grew to regret.

Far and beyond the confines of solitude I explore other domains.
None have yet to cause my eyes to end the sight of life's pains.
Try to unite with nature's peace I oftentimes have done,
But the moment I hear vibrant echoes I hide within the rays of the sun.

Times of seclusion seem to be painful in the eyes of another;
Upon them I frown because I hear the sounds when they're fighting one another.
As long as the sun rises above reflecting its light on the moon,
I will remain as the silence of sound enjoying life without any doom.
