The Crow

1.
The voices of the old ones follow us, warnings in whispers,
fear fed to us in bottles along with our milk.

The first time alone,
we stand, terrified and perfectly still, in the kitchen
waiting for them to come home.

From a distance, I am awed by the prizes you wear like a crown of flowers.
When I meet you, your face is the glass in which I am reflected.
In your voice, I hear a shaking so deep I expect you to fly apart.
Though our names, changed by marriage, are anonymous, the immigrant faces line up in our heads. We count them, compulsively, as if they were beads.

In our ears,
a voice,
connected to us like a cord, whispers you aren’t really very much you guinea, you wop, so we struggle
to blot out the sound of the crow who sits on our shoulder and laughs, blot out the voice
that belittles all we do, and drives us to be best.
“My daughter,
she’s ugly, but smart.”

3.
I tell you about the reading with the poet of the beautiful hair who keeps tossing her head back, that glorious mane, while I huddle in my chair and think of having to follow her, to get up just after she sits down.
How my insides quake and that hair, but I get up and turn the joke against myself before they can.
My mother tells me I’m beautiful but I know she means inside.

You know,
I know,
we know,
who always has to be best?
We are driven women, and we’ll never escape the voices we carry within us.
